Stories from Genesis

"What am I going to teach tomorrow? I am out of ideas!"

The solution to this problem is to plan your lessons in groups of stories that will take you several weeks to complete.

Sunday school teachers in many assemblies of believers are often given complete autonomy to select and teach whatever Biblical topic they like. Such freedom is a both a blessing and a burden. It's a blessing in that there is no official religious creed to follow. You simply need to teach the whole Word of God. However, it is a difficult task to select something that is interesting, relevant to the students and covers basic Bible doctrines.

A learning unit is a series of related lessons or Sunday school activities that a teacher plans to use over several classes.

This simple display of pictures from Genesis can help you immensely in your Sunday school class for three reasons:

1) Planning. You can plan your next 13 weeks of life in the class. Teaching a unit of lessons is a good strategy for teachers who find themselves scrambling the night before class asking themselves "What should I teach tomorrow"?

2) Context. Your students should be able to see that Bible stories are inter-related and sequential.

3) Review. You should devote part of each class talking about previous lessons. Using games such as memory, Jeopardy, Hangman, Tic-Tac-Toe and others, ask questions from past lessons.
